Dear Constituent

RE: EARLY DAY MOTION 865 – SAUDI CROWN PRINCE AND YEMEN.

Thank you for your recent correspondence in respect of EDM 865 and the recent visit to the UK by the Crown Prince of Saudi Arabia, Mohammad Bin.

As a Parliamentary Private Secretary, I am not able to sign Early Day Motions, as doing so would likely be in breach of the Ministerial Code's rules on collective responsibility. However, in any event, I have general concerns about the effectiveness and expense of the EDM system, and I have attached a copy of an excellent article written by my colleague, Chris Heaton-Harris MP, which I feel succinctly sets out those concerns. I hope that this will be of interest to you, and essentially, I think it is much more effective to raise concerns directly with Ministers, both verbally, and in writing, rather than signing EDMs.

However, it is my view that maintaining a good relationship with Saudi Arabia allows us to support their important programme of reform, which includes the lifting of the ban on women driving and attending sporting events, and allowing cinemas to operate in the Kingdom, as well as co-operating on tackling international challenges, such as terrorism.

A good relationship with Saudi Arabia also enables us to have frank conversations on matters where we both have concerns. I would like to assure you that while the Crown Prince was in the UK, talks were held on how to work together to end the tragic conflict in Yemen.

The UK and Saudi Arabia are clear that a solution to the conflict must ensure that Saudi Arabia no longer faces missile attacks from Yemen, many of which have targeted its major cities, including Riyadh. I am pleased that it was agreed to strengthen the UN inspection of shipping in order to ensure that all Yemeni ports remain open to the humanitarian and commercial supplies that Yemen's people so desperately need.

The UK will redouble our efforts to support the UN political process and Ministers are hopeful that counterparts from the US and the United Arab Emirates can be convened before Easter in order to make more progress towards a political solution which is absolutely necessary.

I am also very pleased to hear that Saudi Arabia will be developing a plan for the reconstruction of Yemen after any settlement of the conflict.

Enhancing our co-operation in tackling international challenges such as terrorism, extremism, the conflict and humanitarian crisis in Yemen, and other regional issues such as Iraq and Syria, is beneficial for regional security and indeed our own security here.

Once again, thank you for having taken the time to contact me and if I can ever be of any further assistance to you then please do not hesitate to contact me again.

with best wishes,

Tom

Chris Heaton-Harris: Why Early Day Motions are politically impotent

Writing exclusively for PoliticsHome, Conservative MP Chris Heaton-Harris describes Early Day Motions as 'politically impotent', and warns he is 'not going to waste time and money on sponsoring or signing EDMs'.

Since being elected last year, a number of my constituents have asked me to sign Early Day Motions (EDMs). I'm afraid I haven't signed any yet and don't plan on changing that in the future as I think they are pretty much politically impotent and too costly in their current form.

I'm not alone either, quite a number of the 2010 intake all independently decided to do the same thing and I would imagine that if the rules around EDMs don't change at the next election, even more MPs will join the "just say no" bandwagon.

Supposedly EDMs cost around £500 a go and we have already had 2423 tabled in this Parliament. Looking through the titles of the EDMs you'll see many a worthy political cause being lauded, people recently passed away remembered and an abundant amount of motherhood and apple pie. Yet even the most benign EDM rarely gets more than 50 signatories; indeed, many barely scrape into double figures.

I really do think that we need to change how EDMs can be sponsored before too many MPs decide to call it a day on them. Surely a sensible solution would be to say that an individual Member should not be allowed to table an EDM? We should at least try to separate the more popular ones by asking that there be at least ten MPs proposing for it to be accepted as being tabled and thus, opened up for others to sign.

Considering there are MPs out there who tend to sign a large number of EDMs (Sir Peter Bottomley and Alan Meale, please take a bow) surely setting an entry point of ten signatures is not an oppressive barrier if you really do care about a subject?

One of the main reasons (if not the main reason) why so few people sign EDMs is that in the last few years they have turned into the tool of the crap lobbyist. Sitting in a meeting room trying to work out how to justify their Client's retainer, many believe that if they can get a few signatures on an EDM he has done his or her job. Even better if you can persuade your client to run a campaign to get more MPs to sign up; more money for you to set up pointless meetings to talk about a pointless campaign to try and get more than a dozen signatures for a pointless motion that will be ignored by Government and just about everyone else too.

If you are a business, charity or NGO and your Public Affairs outfit recommends an EDM - fire them immediately! Few people take any notice of them and so they are really no more than political graffiti.

So, to my Constituents I say if you are writing to me, please don't ask me to sign an EDM. I'll happily raise subjects with Ministers, ask questions in the House or try to have a Westminster Hall debate - in other words, do things that actually count - but I'm not going to waste time and money on sponsoring or signing EDMs.
